

The Grand Inquisitor

But, he was only a shadow.

He was not the Prince of Darkness

the veiled Mistress smiles gently.

She gave me an address and instructions

He lives on

The majesty of willing life-in-death in Absolute Zero

Night's Neurons

The Weaver (June 2007, Mumbai)

Betwixt waking and eternity the corridor twists and turns darkness peeps out of many doors

left ajar.

Out in the open a man steps out of the lamplight into the rain he wears a long, black coat his voice is breaking and his eyes are earnest.

He drives off in a van, full of people into mortal danger there are no digits on the number plate.

The corridor turns like a thread for Sydney Carton on a spindle in his weary hands.
He reeks of midnight's oil.
The rain drips off his shoulders like a chill into his heart
His lamp is burning and the door is shut.

Wait Until Dark (February 2014, Mumbai)

The wings of night are spreading wide the Morgul Lord unmounts his hands are cold as ice his breath forks like a tongue a sheet of flame, twisting and unwavering his eyes the usual empty sockets hopelessly out of sync for it is daylight that he haunts.

The night, the pristine, the undying night
keeps us safe, unmirrored untouched within Her bosom for if any of Her creatures should see the day be it an owl, besieged by ravens or a candle flame in a pile of amorphous wax or a student grappling with a crowd of random cadences and flashing rhythms a fastening of fancies into tens and fives and sevens and their noises, if one of us forgets a turning, strays into the deepening shadows of daylight and forgets the way, the noonday sun will have his fill and let us go and She will find us where She left us in the midnight hour.

To Swell A Progress (March 2015, Mumbai)

A voice: What will you do when you're free?
When the memory of this tiger and that no longer snarls at your gate?
When your bones have left their grating at chalkboards squeaking clean allowing no dust particles to settle with ease at the counter dark matter white matter in a parallel universe I answered - almost.

My eyes are tired from too little widening the muscles are stretched thin now blowing out at elliptical fault lines cavernous as hot air balloons and just as vacuous in their leaning into the bitter air.

And yet, there is a way of gentleness a deathly stillness that rips the sky open and in between the seconds uncountable millennia leave just enough breathing room for a promised freedom.

Class (October 2001, Philadelphia Suburbs)

Your curses clamor through the walls, the crickets shrill, the boiler's rumbling grin a grin, not quite a laugh, a grin escapes the boiler room below muscles in its chin contort in heed, in heat, to conversation's end.
Pieces of your soul are strewn like coals into this empty din.

I read between the minutes of the night freezing autumn night unquenched the boiler's heat in rhapsody, in flame in flame upon my back in chill upon my feet.

I read between the minutes of the night
your face caught in a struggle with my swearing friend I looked at you with brave and tender eyes.

Other Poems by Acushla Sarswat

Blood and Rain

A View from an Ex-Aristo (Mumbai, 2014)

Mother of God!
There you stand tall and proud the blade across your torso angled like a grey black sports bra but you have no breasts.
Why no breasts?
Only straight lines running true without curving without bending.
I stand for my turn sometimes sit waiting always waiting for you to christen me again your pen writing my name in blood, in drops of red ink rolling, rolling with my severed head across the floor my thoughts disembodied stuck in limbo for a soul to pick them up somewhere off the mainline.
I think they've lost my number I've been waiting for hours the never-ending minute seems to stretch across eternity like a rubber band carrying within it infinite tension never breaking always teasing just a little further ...

Your blade is dull today it carries rust there is no one to whet it.
We are saved by gravity alone Madame la Guillotine!
May Thou always be so merciful.
Hallowed be Thy Name.

Sand and Yang (Mumbai, 2014)

The safest place in the universe is the eye of a hurricane.

Walls of steam rise up around me making havoc of buildings, trucks breaking trees like pencils carving messages into uranium reactors that pop and fizz like corks and balloons now spurting blood as if some wrathful Goddess eyeless in the steam-colored garb of Isis drawn like oil paintings from the wells of fantasy threw a party for a fan following of misshapen clowns and half-baked misanthropomorphic entities hanging out the bored masculinity of the ancient desert having been assured that there is no water on the red planet and no little blue men worth waiting for hooded or otherwise.

The balloons we live in are fragile and yet the storm protects us for the whirlwind has no center.

His dark anger spins Him in the vortex of memory.

And who are you to talk of fantasy said He you who live in the land of Bell Curves and Sorting Hats?

August (Philadelphia, 2002)

As you walk by the air becomes so heavy I am pushed against a wall Is it you or is it just the heat of August?
Hiroshima breeze
you are so heavy I am hanging like the leaves on the drying summer trees pulled down towards the earth Is it you or is it just the August air that makes me droop with so much longing?

The August sun was always known to burn us lesser mortals with his august glare

We sacrificed an apple for the rain I kissed the earth
I heard a little girl cry out as if she knew the presence there If August comes creeping like a whisper through the hollows of your mind tell me, love then does September trudge behind?
If you were a pebble in the walls of Jerusalem would they come crashing down?

Is it you or is it just the mushrooms clouds of August?
Sodom and Gomorrah lifted out like mushrooms from our lore, our fantasies borne into reality and christened Hiroshima, Nagasaki ... hanging heavy in the firmament laden with their sixty years of ripened weariness your glance is heavy as the August rain shining through them and the trees.

The stares of the undying lifted through the skies reflecting points of consciousness the dying steps of the millenium now reborn into the new thunder like the heavy August rain and you.

Waiting for Rain (June, 2005, Mumbai)

Climb, gaze up where the steeple meets the sky scribble someone's name into the dust-filled clouds.

Casino in the heavens lit by lightning somewhere the westerly wind sits poker faced covering diamonds about to be scattered wait for the sparkling rain.

Shards of Light (October, 2005, Mumbai)

In the shredded darkness of this night dazzled and undeafened stupid stupid, staring eyes stuck in the stupor of unceasing sight the heaviness of nothingness plodding through tortuous miles of wakefulness and twisting arms of time tick-ticking through eternity.

Arise! Awake! Shake off your sleep!
You swept through the room in all of your magnificence.
An army of rays assailed us nailing me to shadows that have dared remain.

Eyelids jammed are not like doors the lock of sleep cannot be forced with chisels chisels are at work carving out my name into each terrifying minute.

Acknowledgments: I have quoted song lyrics by Iron Maiden and Megadeth in some of my verses.

Other Poems by Acushla Sarswat