

Ismail Merchant: Film Producer Extraordinary / Partha Chatterjee

Ismail Merchant with James Ivory

Ismail Merchant's passing away on May 25, 2005 marked the end of a certain kind of cinema. He was the last of the maverick film producers with taste who made without any compromise, films with a strong literary bias which were partial to actors and had fine production values. It is sad that he died at sixty eight of bleeding ulcers unable to any longer work his legendary charm on venal German financiers who were supposed to finance his last production, The White Countess, which was to have been directed by his long-time partner James Ivory.

Merchant-Ivory productions came into being in 1961 when,

Ismail

Merchant, a Bohra Muslim student on a scholarship in America met James Ivory, an Ivy-leaguer with art and cinema on his mind, quite by accident in a New York coffee shop. The rest as they say is history. Together they made over forty films in a relationship that lasted all of forty-four years. A record in the annals of independent filmmaking anywhere in the world.

Ivory's gentle, inward looking vision may never have found expression on the scale that it did but for Merchant's amazing resourcefulness that included coaxing, cajoling, bullying and charming all those associated, directly and indirectly with the making of his films.

Merchant-Ivory productions' first venture was a documentary, The Delhi

Way back in 1962. The next year they made a feature length fiction film The Householder in Black and White. It was about a young college lecturer, tentative and clumsy trying to find happiness with his wife from a sheltered background. Ironically the script was written by Ruth Praver Jhabvala, a Jewess from Poland married to a Parsee Indian architect. James Ivory who knew nothing about the subject did a fine job of directing his first real film.

He had made a couple of pleasant documentaries earlier.

The crew was basically Satyajit Ray's, a director who was already being acknowledged the world over as a Master and whose Apu trilogy, Jalsa

Ghar (The Music Room) and other films had made a lasting impression on international audiences and critics. His cameraman Subrata Mitra, also lionized, photographed The Householder which was designed by Bansi Chandragupta, the most resourceful art director in India, trained by Eugene Lourie, who created most evocative sets for Jean Renoir's The River, shot in Barrackpore, near Calcutta in 1950.

The success of the Householder in the West was largely due to the efforts of Merchant's energy and drive. He wooed the Press which responded warmly almost to a man. His film went to those distributors who could give it maximum exposure and a decent royalty. His task was made easier by the rousing reception accorded to Satyajit Ray's lyrical cinema to which Merchant Ivory's maiden effort owed clear allegiance.

Their second film Shakespearewallah (1965) had an elegiac tone which added poignance to its lyricism. It was a fictionalized account of a true story.

A well-known English theatre couple Jeffrey and Laura Kendall who play people like themselves in the film actually ran a peripatetic theatre company in the British India of the 1930s, and 40s. The troupe got into grave financial difficulties when their audience endowed anglicized Public schools and Country Clubs whose members belonged to flourishing British mercantile establishments suddenly lost interest in all things English. The purple patches from Shakespeare done by the company, which also had some Indian actors in real life, as in the film, no longer interested people, whose enthusiasm for culture could best be described as ephemeral.

Only the romance between the young daughter of the English couple and an Indian rake was fiction. The performances were first-rate and Felicity Kendall as the daughter was moving. Beautifully photographed in B/W by Subrata Mitra and scored by Satyajit Ray, whose music sold half-a- million long-playing records, Shakespearewallah was a huge success in America and Europe. Ismail was only twenty-eight years old when he produced his second feature film. He proved himself to be a man of fine taste, possessing the ability to grasp an opportunity when it presented itself.

In retrospect, one can say he best illustrated the idea that artistes are a product of history. They reflect a certain spirit of their times—so too with Ismail Merchant and his alter ego, the director James Ivory. They came at a turbulent moment in Western politics, culture and cinema. The French New Wave was about to peak and had already revealed the staggering possibilities of film narration. Filmmakers as disparate in temperament as

Alain Resnais, Jacques Tati, Robert Bresson, Jean Luc Goddard,

Eric

Rohmer and Francois Truffaut had enriched film language and proudly declared it an art form to be taken as seriously as literature, music, theatre or the plastic arts. In the Anglo-Saxon world classical cinema was in its last throes, and its greatest master John Ford was unemployed, ignored by know all young men running Hollywood. There was a niche for a different, gentler kind of storytelling and Merchant-Ivory films filled it.

Their early productions were devoted to selling exotic India abroad and who could do it better than Ismail? The third film that Ismail and James did together was set in Benares. The Guru (1968) had the contretemps of a famous classical sitarist with his two wives—one traditional, the younger one modern, as its focal point. Mahesh Yogi's Transcendental Meditation had swept across America promising deliverance from the ravages of greed and avarice brought by relentless capitalism. Recognizing this phenomenon, the story included as a catalyst an English pop star and his girlfriend. India and its contradictions, the musician attracted to modernity but comfortable only when maintaining status quo, his celebrity English disciple and his girl both hoping to find peace in the holy city where the ustad lives, all this constituted a visually interesting but not witty or incisive narrative.

Energetic promotion prevented the film from being a dead loss. While it did not make a reasonable profit, it made money—only some.

Bombay Talkie (1970) the fourth Merchant-Ivory offering was about an ageing male star, who was unable to cope with his own life, fame that was soon going to elude him, and the unreal world of Hindi cinema. Apart from Zia Mohyeddin's powerful performance as an ignored lyricist, and Subrata Mitra's camerawork, including a long bravura sequence at the beginning, there was little to recommend about the film. Utpal Dutt, whose dynamic presence held The Guru together, was just about adequate as a harried film producer. Shashi Kapoor who was so good in the first two films, looked tired here.

Bombay Talkie did nothing for Ismail Merchant or James Ivory. Two films in a row that barely made money, put the company under financial strain. For the first time in his life, Ismail was forced to deal with the unyielding Jewish moneymen of New York on less than equal terms. The experience marked him for life and made him a skinflint. His old friend and colleague Shashi Kapoor, remarked on television that Ismail did not like paying any of his actors and technicians anymore than he absolutely had to. The Savages (1973) was made in the U.S. in an old colonial Restoration mansion, in Scarborough, forty minutes away from New York. The old place and the jungle nearby gave Ivory the idea of bringing in jungle dwellers from Stone Age into the twentieth century. An object the "Savages" had never seen before, a coloured ball, suddenly descends in their midst. The retrieval of it by people from the modern era provides material for a potentially hilarious and wise film. The script based on an idea by Ivory and not written by Jhabvala, lacked subtlety and humour. Although the director saw it as a "Hudson River Last Day in Marienbad", his film had all of Alain Resnais's intellectual tomfoolery but none of his poetic intensity. Merchant understood right away that original material was not the duo's cup of tea, and thereafter relied, exclusively on literature to provide the ballast for their films.

After The Wild Party (1975), a sincere but inept attempt to recreate the excesses of the Jazz age in sinful old Hollywood, an undertaking the inspiration for which may well have been the jewelled prose of F. Scott Fitzgerald, Merchant Ivory production was again in dire straits. Certain critics including Pauline Kael of the New Yorker even called Ismail and James a pair of amateurs. The energy that drove their first two films seemed to have deserted them.

Merchant would have to turn things around speedily before America wrote them off. Roseland (1977) set in a real ballroom of that name in New York where people come to shed their loneliness was too civilized, too tentative to move viewers. Although it had a solid cast led by old-timer Teresa Wright with Lou Jacobi, Geraldine Chaplin and Christopher Walken who featured in the three inter-connected episodes, it was lacking in drive. Ivory seemed to have found a cinematic language that was true to his temperament, but it still needed polishing. The opportunity came with an adaptation by Ruth Praver Jhabwala, who else, of Henry James's The Europeans (1979). The interiorized pre-modern drama was just what Merchant Ivory productions needed. Accolades followed and actress Lee Remick's performance in a pivotal role was greatly appreciated. It was more than a success d'esteeme. People in large numbers bought tickets to see it. Ismail and James had finally made it to the front rank of American and European filmmakers. They were still in their late thirties.

The following year in 1980, they tried their hand at an experimental musical Jane Austen in Manhattan about various troupes wanting to perform a 19th century manuscript by Jane Austen written in her childhood that was recently discovered. It starred Anne Baxter, who shot to fame thirty years earlier as Eve Harrington in Joseph L. Mankiewicz's All about Eve and Robert Powell, also a contemporary of hers. Made on a shoestring budget of 450, 000 dollars, it was like the proverbial curate's cake, good in parts.

Quartet (1981) based on Jean Rhys's despairing existentialist novel about bohemian Paris in the late 1920s starring Isabelle Adjani, Maggie Smith, Alan Bates and photographed in luminous low-key by Pierre L'Homme, cinematographer to Jean Pierre Melville, father of the French new wave, was a feather in James Ivory's cap. It was possible only because of Merchant's exceptional organizing skills and uncanny judgment of the artistic and commercial climate of Europe and America.

There was indeed room then for a quieter, more reflective kind of cinema in the English-speaking world, especially after Hollywood had expended its energies on mainly violent moralistic dramas and thrillers. The 'serious'

French cinema, thanks or no thanks to the brilliant cinematic combustions of

Jean Luc Godard, Alain Resnais, Jacques Rivette and Chris Marker had been forced to virtually abandon the linear narrative, with the notable exception of Francois Truffaut and, more so, Jean Pierre Rappeneau. It secretly welcomed well-told stories from any part of the world. Satyajit Ray's films and those of Merchant Ivory found favour with discerning French audiences, principally in Paris.

Ismail and James returned to the twilight world of Maharajas and 'illicit' love; the consequences of one is probed by a young Englishwoman in Heat and Dust (1983). Julie Christie is the woman who comes to India to understand her late grandaunt's affair with a Maharaja (Shashi Kapoor) and falls in love with a handsome youth (Zakir Husain) and gets impregnated by him. It was a big hit. Though Merchant-Ivory had to take a lot of flak from the critics. Ismail's logic was clear. Someone had to pay for the homes and offices in London, New York and Bombay (now Mumbai). The next year it was time to regain critical acclaim and the affections of a loyal audience. Once again it was Henry James to the rescue and his Bostonians was Merchant Ivory's key to success. It restored their prestige and gave them an unspoken right to adapt works of 'difficult' writers for the screen.

E.M. Forster, a great but not popular English writer was next on their agenda. A Room With a View (1986) featuring Daniel Day Lewis, son of poet C. Day Lewis, Helena Bonham Carter, Judi Dench and Maggie Smith, was the first attempt to find a cinematic equivalent to Forster's prose which was at first glance unsuitable for an audio-visual interpretation. There was too little physical action in his writing—A Passage to India and Where Angels Fear to Tread have short bursts of it—most of what occurs was in the minds of his characters. Merchant and Ivory won a fair bit of critical acclaim, and made decent amounts of money on it.

Their films were always about people, trying to find themselves—deliberately or not. The price they pay to arrive at an understanding with life is usually heavy. Most often they are aware of their dilemma; however, there are exceptions. Does Stephen, the faithful old butler in Lord Darlington's household really comprehend what an unfair hand he has been dealt by his former employers in Remains of the Day (1993)? Only Miss Kenton, the housekeeper, who like Stephens is now without a job, seems to know despite a stoic acceptance of her fate.

Kazuo Ishiguro's novel helps Ivory make perhaps his finest film: a quiet, understated, but never the less powerful depiction of class and privilege in pre-war England. The same pair of actors Anthony Hopkins, and Emma Thompson from their Forster triumph of a year earlier Howards End were repeated to great effect in Remains of the Day.

Howards End (1992) was set during the economic depression that swept Europe and America in the late 1920s through the mid-1930s. It was about naked abuse of power and ruthless assertion of privilege. Anthony Hopkins as an aristocrat with a roving eye is riveting but it is the women who elicit both respect and sympathy. Emma Thompson and Helena Bonham Carter as sisters from the middle-class whose trust is betrayed heartlessly by the aristocrat, culminating in the murder of a male friend of the younger sister, with their accurate reading of social situations, throw the film into a political perspective which needs no polemics to comprehend. If this article is as much about Ivory as it is about Merchant then there is a reason for it. They were joined artistically at the hip. One was at his best only when complementing the other. It was Ismail who encouraged, even inspired James, to stretch himself to discover his true métier; to take risks with complex literary texts that were difficult to film but could be immensely rewarding once an effective method was discovered.

Who for instance had dared to film primarily uncinematic authors like Forster and James in an Anglo-Saxon cinema? Who dared to gamble and win but Ivory egged on by Merchant. To make meaningful cinema out of texts with sub-terranean relationships hidden under a patina of good manners, where what was being said and done often meant the opposite, was no mean achievement.

This kind of interiorized drama was also the highlight of Mr and Mrs Bridge (1990) with Paul Newman and Joanne Woodward playing the eponymous couple. Set in Kansas City during the Depression, it travels over two generations to Paris. The inclusion of the Louvre as a location was a masterstroke, made possible through Ismail's penchant for legerdemain.

Apart from Newman and Woodward's stand out performances as a rich couple stultified by time unable to understand the changing world around them, there was the elegant presentation of a difficult idea. Adapted from two novels by Evans Connell, Mr. and Mrs. Bridge was a critical as well as a commercial triumph.

Ismail had once said in an interview that he had brought in Jefferson in Paris (1995) for five million dollars; a feat beyond any producer, independent or backed by a Hollywood studio. To make a period piece about the second president of the United States and him courting his future French wife, for such a sum was a well nigh impossible task. The film was panned despite Nick Nolte's caring performance and Pierre L'Homme's telling photography.

It was only a year earlier in 1994 that Ismail had made his own debut as a director in feature films. It is not that he had never been behind the camera before. His short The Creation of Women (1960) had been nominated for an Oscar in its category and later Mahatma and The Mad Boy (1974) of twenty-seven minutes duration was highly acclaimed. It is quite possible that he had grown tired of fundraising for large projects that had to be reasonably budgeted to be commercially viable. He wanted to do a small, intimate film he could call his own. He chose Anita Desai's novel In Custody to do as Muhafiz in Urdu. He got Desai and Shahrukh Husain to write the screenplay, which was set in contemporary Bhopal. Noor, a huge, custardy man, a once important Urdu poet is on his last legs, dying of adulation heaped on him by sycophants much like the rich food he so enjoys. He lives with his two wives, one like him old but unlike him reliable and the other a young, opportunistic tart rescued from a local brothel and the mother of his son. Devan, a young Hindu lecturer devoted to the Urdu language is asked by his publisher friend to do an interview with Noor for his journal. What follows, is in turn, comic and sad. Noor's interview is botched by a novice sound recordist. He dies suddenly, but Devan somehow manages to bring out a collection of Noor's poems.

Muhafiz is also about a highly expressive language that is being allowed to die out in independent India for exclusively political reasons. All official work in courts and police stations was done in Urdu before the partition of India in 1947. Immediately after, Hindi became the official language of the State. All avenues of Government employment suddenly closed for Urdu students. Noor a poet of sensitivity and discernment became a victim of capricious politics. To add insult to injury, his second wife sang his ghazals and passed them off as her own.

Ismail chose the more difficult intimist mode for his film. Rarely did the cinema go out of the poet's house. There were precisely five other locations, namely Devan's home and his college; his colleague Siddiqui's home and the office of the Urdu weekly which has commissioned Devan to do Noor's interview and the visit by boat to Sufi Saints' Mazar on an island in a lake. The last scene of Noor's funeral procession is seen mostly from a distance, mainly to create scale.

Too many things went wrong for intention to match achievement. For one, Ismail had been away from home for much too long; true he did come back periodically to make films, but these were not connected closely with the imperceptibly changing social scene. He did not really have the time to study

India for he was far too busy administering to the needs of the film at hand.

His knowledge of Urdu, for all his enthusiasm, was at best sketchy.

Choosing the poetry of a revolutionary poet like Faiz Ahmed Faiz to do duty for most of Noor's was a mistake. Anyone familiar with Faiz's oeuvre will immediately realize that it does not sit well on the lips of a bacchante like Noor. Perhaps Josh Malihabadi's poetry would have been more apt, for it would have been closer to Noor's spirit. More attention should have been paid to his ghazals especially those picturised on his second wife. They are sung in a lackluster manner by Kavita Krishnamurthy. Even the one rendered by Hariharan lacks conviction. They should have had more melody, more raga content. This was all the more surprising because Ustad Zakir Husain was the composer.

Ismail was in much greater control doing his second film Cotton Mary (2000) in English, with a script by Alexandra Viets adapted from her own play. It was about an Anglo-Indian Ayah who decides to make herself indispensable to her English mistress whose baby she helps to nurse. Mary, though, a servant uses her dominant position over her employer suffering from post-natal depression, to push her own case to go to England—home country for the Eurasian. As expected all her schemes fall apart and she is finally taken in by her relatives who she had till recently despised. Mary never really comes to terms with her own identity.

This problem of identity forms the core of A Soldier's Daughter Never Cries (1998) directed by James Ivory and based on an autobiographical novel by Kaylie Jones, daughter of James Jones, author of From Here to Eternity, Go to the Sun, The Widower and The Thin Red Line. The fundamental question of recognizing oneself is raised once again in The Mystic Masseur (2002) the last film that Merchant directed. V.S. Naipaul's comic novel about an Indian from Trinidad trying to discover himself in London allowed for a mixture of wit and seriousness.

Ismail and James worked together for the last time together in 2003 on L'Divorce, a farce set in contemporary Paris in which doltish Americans and French do not know what to do with themselves. An American young woman, pregnant with her first child, is abandoned by her upper class French husband for another woman. The hapless mother-to-be is joined by her younger sister newly arrived from the U.S. only to be seduced by her estranged brother-in-law's rake of an uncle! The absconding young husband dies a gratuitous death; a sweet, chubby baby is born to his wife. Nobody learns anything from what life has to offer.

Ismail Merchant's life had a lot to offer. In middle age he had become a gourmet and gourmand, a television celebrity and a writer of popular cookbooks. He had proved his worth and durability as a producer of quality cinema whose foundation lay in good writing and had gifted the world an unusual and talented filmmaker in James Ivory. He had also paved the way for those independent producers and directors, not necessarily from India, who were to follow after him. Last but not least he had proved that if there was a will to make a really fine film then the means to make it could also be found. He was a man of rare qualities.
